

This paper explores how the committee decision-making by voting affects the extent of moral of the subjects and designs laboratory experiments to do so. We hypothesize that if an individual's expected utility is characterized by single peaked, the individual's WTP in collective decision-making under voting rules remains the same as the one in individual decision-making. However, we found from experimental studies that the WTP were lower under the voting rules.