This study examines the effectiveness of data-based bid-rigging screening in deterring bid-rigging through a social experiment using the Randomized Controlled Trial method. While some argue that screening for collusion is effective in deterring collusion, others argue that it is not as effective as it could be. In this study, we break down the various effects of collusion screening to see which effect works more strongly.