

This paper considers delegation of a decision to a team of informed agents. It shows under what conditions delegation is optimal as well as to whom to delegate the formal decision-making right. The latter depends on a trade-off between 1) improved communication and better information in the team when the player with the decision-making rights is considered closer to the other agents' preferences and 2) the cost from distorted decisions due to biased and misaligned preferences.